Automatic Feeder

Many southern farmers, who would like to install automatic feed handling setups, often pass them up because they feel they lack buildings large enough to hold the necessary electric equipment. That such tight-sided buildings, so necessary in cold climates, are not needed for this operation in the South is shown by the above picture.

Taken on a farm near Roanoke, Va., it shows a combination indoors-outdoors arrangement. Whole grain is fed into the outdoor mill, to the left. Here it is ground and then elevated by blower pipe into feed bins inside the combination grain and machinery storage shed in the background.

NAVIGATION ON THE JAMES RIVER

A FACTUAL STORY on shallow-draft navigation on the James River, its history, romance and highlights, is being told in a four-part serial in Virginia and Virginia County Magazine, official organ of the League of Virginia Counties, whose editorial and advertising offices are at 24-A North 8th St., Richmond.

Part I of the story—Canaling on the Jeems and Kanawhy"—by Leighman Hawkins, Roanoke, Va., appears in the July issue, just released and Parts II, III, and IV will appear in the issues for August, September and October.

"Canaling on the Jeems and Kanawhy" spans the history of boat-traffic between Richmond, Lynchburg, Buchanan and Lexington . . . and landings in between . . . from the days of its inception by George Washington (1795) until abandonment and sale (1880) to the Rich-mond and Alleghany Railroad (now Chesapeake and Ohio Railway) whose right-of-way was built along the towpath.

There were two distinct phases of transportation on the James River . . . and hence, different sorts of craft. Prior to 1840 it was known as "sluice navigation" meaning that canals were built only around rapids and other obstructions that could not be cleared by digging or blasting . . the main stream, improved with wingdams . . being used for traffic.

Freight in those days moved mostly in small mule-drawn, open-topped barges or in hand - polled batteaus. Sluice navigation, however, was never satisfactory because it left shipping too much to the mercy of the weather; beached craft during low water and risky (or impossible) movement during heavy rains.

SEEKING TO FIND
OLDEST "UKES"

Broadcast Music, Inc., is trying to find the three oldest ukeleles in the continental United States. It is not a contest but a sincere desire to locate the oldest "ukes" in the country. They will play $100 for the oldest and $50 and $25 each for the second and third oldest. Letters should be written citing the history and age of each ukelele entered, and the letter should be mailed to Radio Station WWOD, Lynchburg.

Demand Increases in Va. For Fluid Milk

Strengthened demand for fluid milk on Virginia markets is reported by Ben F. Morgan, Jr., dairy marketing specialist at V. P. I.

Instead of the usual decline in fluid milk sales in the spring, such as occurred in 1949, the sales have increased in almost all markets, Morgan says.

Average daily Class I sales in 20 of Virginia's controlled markets in May were 7 per cent more than in May last year, and 1 per cent over April. All markets but one showed an increase.

Increases of 14 per cent in Suffolk, and 11 per cent in Petersburg-Hopewell, were the largest shown in any market.

HOG CHOLERA STILL NO. 1 HOG KILLER

Other diseases may hit harder in some communities but the ration's worst killer is still hog cholera. Thousands of outbreaks are reported every year. The disease seems worse in cycles, some years being worse than others.

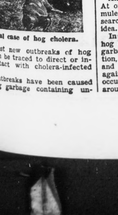
Hog cholera, as tuberculosis is most commonly transmitted, by tuberculous cooked pork scraps, by virus present in rivers and creeks, by carrier birds, or by the virus being carried on people's shoes, and even on truck and wagon wheels.

Careless or inexperienced use of vaccinating virus also may start an outbreak. In such cases, instead of protecting the animals, the unskilled vaccinator actually is giving them the disease.

Usually, once introduced into a drove, hog cholera spreads rapidly from hog to hog, killing most animals it infects. This high death loss is one of the most typical symptoms of the disease, although in some forms it kills slowly.

All breeds of swine are susceptible. At one time it was thought that the mulefoot hog was immune, but research veterinarians disproved this idea.

In view of the many ways which hog cholera virus can be spread—by garbage feeding, unskilled vaccination, streams, visitors, tires, insects and birds—the only safe protection against it in regions where it has occurred, is by vaccination of pigs around weaning time.



A typical case of hog cholera.

Most new outbreaks of hog cholera can be traced to direct or indirect contact with cholera-infected hogs.

Some outbreaks have been caused by feeding garbage containing un-
